The talks, which are being held under the auspices of UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon and attended by around 20 deputy heads of states, are set to address ways of ending the conflict and the reconstruction of Syria. So far, talks have focused on the conflict's first stages and on humanitarian assistance, with observers keen to see whether an agreement can be reached before Saturday's meeting of the UN Security Council – the body that will discuss the crisis – is held. The fact that the International Syria Support Group (ISSG), which is holding the talks, is pushing for a political solution is a significant step. "This time, I think the level of attendance and the level of political interest is the highest in history," said Matthew Rycroft, deputy spokesman of the UN secretary-general.
